After the guests have departed, Leonard Fry makes him a Faustian proposition: he, Leonard Fry, his appetites jaded by the pleasures his enormous wealth has afforded him, wants to undertake an experiment: he wants to lock himself in a bare room, containing only the most basic essentials, for a year.

Bent's role in this endeavour would be to live in Fry's mansion for the year, passing Fry three meals a day through a slot in the door, without any other interaction, even – especially – if he begs to be released.

When Bent locks Fry in the room, the strange trip begins. But there's a mysterious stranger lurking outside the house, and Bent soon begins to wonder who the real subject of Fry's bizarre experiment is.
